Dear Cyril,

Twenty years ago, I started building things in a sector that did not exist yet. Esport looked like a niche. It turned out to be a proving ground for every operational and commercial challenge a fast-moving business can throw at you: international partnerships, institutional relationships, team scaling, crisis management, and execution in markets where the rules are still being written.

As COO at Oxent and Director of ESWC, I ran the operational backbone of one of the world's largest esport competitions. That meant managing a 15-person organization, closing strategic partnerships with Inwi in Morocco and Orange Tunisie in Tunisia, and delivering live events in markets where nothing could be taken for granted. I learned what it means to build trust with institutional partners in Africa, to navigate complex contractual environments, and to make things work when the playbook does not exist yet.

After that, I grew Prodigy Agency from 10 to 30 people, led Webedia Esport's tier-1 brand and publisher partnerships at scale, and most recently built the CSM function at EVA from scratch, driving +190% cumulative network revenue growth over two years.

What connects all of it: I build things that hold. Processes, teams, partnerships, and revenue structures that outlast the moment they were created.

Reading about Honoré Gaming and Sharp Vision, I see a group that operates exactly where I've spent my career: markets where relationships matter more than product decks, where execution beats theory, and where the ability to earn trust with institutional partners is what separates the ones who last from the ones who don't. The Lonase relationship, the PMU France account, the Senegal subsidiary — these are precisely the types of high-stakes, long-horizon engagements I've managed throughout my career.

I'd welcome the chance to discuss how I can help Honoré Gaming scale what's working and build what's next.
